I would like to understand how to implement a map/reduce equivalent in ECLiPSe. I am thinking about this approach (based on MapReduce and the Mapreduce algorithm) but I haven't been able to make it work. I am using ECLiPSe 6.4. A: You can write your own map/reduce (or mapper/reducer) function with ECLiPSe built-in data structures and operators. Here is a simple example, but without using ECLiPSe built-in data structures: (declare (inline sum-map)) (declare (inline reduce)) (define (sum-map) (reduce + (map + (list 1 2 3) (list-ref '(5 6 7 8) 5))

Java is the programming language used at the Roasoft development centers for creating and editing most Roasoft products.The invention is related to thermal interface materials and more particularly to thermal interface materials and thermal grease that have low viscosity and high thermal conductivity. The grease is especially useful in applications such as, for example, cooling, insulating and heat sinking circuit boards, computer hard drives and optical devices. Thermal interface materials include thermal grease and thermal pads. Thermal grease typically includes an elastomeric grease and an additive that is a particulate filler such as graphite. Thermal grease is used to cool electronics components, such as BGA packages, CSP's, CPU's, DRAM chips, OTA's, RMA's, FPGA's, ASIC's, integrated circuits and other electronics components. The thing is that the same mixture of water and alcohol yields different results in the same apparatus, and I have no idea how to prevent that. I do understand the reason - that the water evaporates and you end up with only alcohol (mostly) which increases the apparent viscosity and gives a lower specific gravity. However, if I have a small amount of water in a large volume of alcohol, the result is a specific gravity of almost 1. But if I take the same amount of water (which is about 0.5ml) and the same amount of alcohol, I get almost the same amount of water, but a specific gravity of 0.9. Please see my experimental setup in the image below. As you can see, I have tried to get a constant flow rate with the syringe pump and to minimize the distance between the height of
