With two decoder rings attached to the two vertical bars, the person using the rings. user-action. However, it is important to notice that in several works, the position of a visualization element is obtained by sampling the object's state given by a simulator. For example, when sampling, in many cases, the position of a vehicle is represented as a numerical value but is represented as a ``text`` element on the map. This approach is not viable because the state of such a text cannot be updated in time and possibly in a reasonable manner, when considering its interactive role. The most important conclusion of this section is that it is important to know which position the visualization will receive from the simulator (or from any source of information). Sometimes, it is possible to construct a model that defines a set of possible positions for the objects and positions that are to be discarded and used as positions for visualization. Developers in the planning phase should design their workflows in such a manner that the position of the visualization elements is obtained as close to the actual simulation of the system as possible. Evaluation for an Actual System
