Thus, in terms of trauma, surgery, infection and tumor treatment, there is an overwhelming need for agents that are able to regulate and suppress infiltration of leukocytes into sites of injury, inflammation and tumors. Infiltration of leukocytes into sites of injury, inflammation or tumors is accomplished by the adhesion of leukocytes to the vascular endothelium. The precise molecular mechanisms used by the leukocytes to establish initial contact with the endothelium have not been completely defined. However, it is known that both specific and non-specific interactions play important roles in the initial contact. Specific adhesive interactions are mediated by specific, cell-associated molecular recognition events between specific adhesion molecules on the leukocyte and ligands on the vascular endothelium. Non-specific interactions between the adhesive molecules on the leukocyte and other molecules such as fibronectin and fibrinogen can also occur under conditions of flow within blood vessels. In the search for effective agents to regulate leukocyte migration, attention has focused on cell adhesion molecules which are directly involved in the initial contact between leukocytes and the vascular endothelium. One class of cell adhesion molecules is the integrin family. As reviewed by Hemler (Current Opinion d0c515b9f4
