Homology modeling is a common method to build protein-protein interfaces, but the quality of the predictions remains uncertain. Here we tested the combination of homology modeling and docking to build three-dimensional models of protein complexes, focusing on the interactions between human papillomavirus (HPV) E6 and the human E6 binding protein (E6BP). Our homology modeling techniques were able to predict the positions of 76 C-terminal residues of E6, even though the sequences of E6 and E6BP are only 25% identical. Conformations of E6 were selected by restrained molecular dynamics; the stereochemical quality of the models was then evaluated using Ramachandran statistics and interatomic distances. For the complex formed by E6 and E6BP, the models were better than those obtained by restraint-free dynamics. We predict that residues near the C-terminus of E6 are positioned near the center of the interface, and the residues of the hydrophobic core are buried in a well-ordered surface of E6BP. The models also suggest a novel binding mechanism that depends on residues at the end of the flexible linker between the DNA-binding domains of E6 and E6BP. * Marcello Duarte * * For the full
