How to Decide What to Download Well, now that you've learned a little about what the Internet is, and got a handle on all of the websites you can visit, you might be wondering how to decide what to download. This is a tricky subject, because it's pretty much impossible to remain objective when you're talking about the huge database of things that are out there. One of the few things you can do is seek independent reviews from blogs and search engines like Google, to give you a sense of what other people are saying about these files. The rest is down to you, and your own personal tastes. If you're looking to save time, consider getting the files that are most likely to give you the best results – in other words, if you’re shooting nikon, get the nikon file, if you’re shooting canon, get the canon file, and so on. The reason for this is that you only have to do this once, instead of manually loading hundreds of photos and being defeated by the time you have to invest in downloading all your images. Don’t forget to download the right format for your camera. If you own a basic point and shoot, don’t load the RAW files unless you have a computer with a RAW editor. If your computer doesn’t come with one, you can probably access the file from most computer software by selecting “open as” and choosing RAW. If the file will be used for future projects, it may be worth making a back up of the files before you upload them to your computer. So have fun, but remember to do the right thing, as it's not always so easy to get that good photograph.
