Daniel. Google Chrome Latest Version 69.0.3497.92 (Official Build). R-Studio Data Recovery V.4.5.127437 [Serial] [ENG] [Arx] .Q: Overriding the `__init__` method of a class I'm trying to understand how does the `__init__` method of a python class is invoked for its instances. I understand that it is called after an object has been created. So, say I have a class with `__init__` and I want a class inherited from this. It means I need to call the `__init__` method of the base class, correct? If I set this up in my code, can I assume that any existing instance of this class will already have a `__init__` method defined to its base class? Does this mean that no new instances will be created? In other words, do I have to call the `__init__` method myself, for example using `super()` or do I assume that this has been done automatically? A: Yes, you need to define a `__init__` and also use `super` to call the parent's. `class A(object): def __init__(self, s): self.s = s class B(A): def __init__(self, s): super().__init__(s) # do something B(1)` Keep in mind that the parent class has to be defined before the child class. If you have a base class and a derived class, you should define the derived class first. `class A(object): def __init__(self, s): self.s = s class B(A): # __init__ is defined before I define B def __init__(self, s): super().__init__(s) # do something B(1)` A(1) If A() is a constructor, B() must take over the calls to the base class. `class A(object): def __init__(self, s):`
