Yet an extension of this experience is the torment and anguish that we feel about our Muslim neighbors, including even some who we sit down next to on our airplane flights. Finally, a man of boundless integrity, eloquence, and healing, Muslim reformer and scholar Nader Jahanpour, has, with this book, spoken out about a truth that the Western media and its affiliates have deliberately suppressed. He and his family have been beaten and arrested over and over again and forced to move from their residence in a multiracial neighborhood in the heart of Washington, DC, because of their Islam. He and his wife have been denied a loan to even allow their house to be refurbished because of their non-Muslim beliefs. When Mr. Jahanpour was a high school student, his classmates stole the books from his home because they accused him of attempting to destroy America's values by opposing what they called "the Zionist agenda." The Jahanp

I'm modifying a simple Makefile to build a library out of a few binaries. All this works fine if the binaries are in the same directory as my executable (at least on Linux). Now I want to have all the binaries in the same directory as the main executable (which of course, is not in the same directory). I've tried to replace BIN =../bin with BIN =../$(TARGET)/../bin which doesn't work. Is there another way to do it, e.g. using some built-in shell functions? A: To expand on what spender said: bin=../bin This is the absolute path to the "current" directory. The correct way to indicate the relative path from the build directory is to use the variable $(SRC): bin=../..../bin To use it in a variable, you need to use../ to get to the parent directory. bin =../..../bin So, you can in principle do: BIN =../..../bin though a more correct way to construct the variable would be to explicitly indicate the src directory: BIN =../..../bin Q: Autofac RegisterWhenRegisteredWithoutUseSuffix Is there a way to force the autofac Registration when registered listener to get called when the registered type (a singleton) is registered in the container? Ideally, I would like the container to create the registration on the fly and inject the singleton into my own type, and then it would get the call when the original registered type is injected into my own type. The problem with the approach below is that it will get called the first time the container tries to resolve my type, and then every time the registered type is used. public class ContainerResolver : IContainerRegistrar { public void Register(ContainerBuilder builder) { 6d1f23a050
