the broken windows theory is cited as a major influence in the development of the u.s. strategy for dealing with urban disorder. the theory was popularized by social scientist george l. kelling and his book the new york times best-selling co-author on broken windows (1982). the broken windows theory is an idea in criminology theory proposed by george l. kelling and james q. wilson in 1982. it states that "the quality of a city's physical infrastructure affects not only how the city looks but also how it functions." in particular, "a broken window is an invitation to a crime," and therefore, "if a broken window is left unrepaired, it sends a signal to criminals that the area is unprotected and provides them with a 'green light' to commit crimes." (for a fuller summary of the theory, see the wikipedia page.) the term "broken windows" is sometimes used to describe the theory itself, and sometimes to describe the aspect of the theory that focuses on visible, negative effects (e.g., graffiti, litter, abandoned cars) and how they affect a community. broken windows policing involves proactive policing, targeting minor crimes such as graffiti and littering, to prevent major crimes like robbery and burglary. broken windows theory is one of the criminological theories, which is the most commonly used theory to explain the correlation between order and crime. it has been advanced by george l. kelling and james q. wilson in their 1982 book "broken windows: the police and neighborhood safety". the broken windows theory was also cited in the "racial profiling" case in the early 2000s. the idea of broken windows is a widely popularized theory. this is especially true in the united states, where it is used to describe areas where low-level crimes are rampant. the term broken windows has become synonymous with the broken windows theory.
