For example, many recently developed credit cards or debit cards have a microchip embedded therein which provides an individual with a unique identifier, such as a credit card or debit card number, that is imprinted on the card. In other words, each card is pre-programmed with an identifier that may not be easily changed. However, credit card numbers are well known, having evolved from the paper checks used prior to the establishment of credit, and are easily replicated by, for example, photocopying. Thus, anyone who is able to obtain access to a pre-programmed credit card or debit card number may use the number to fraudulently procure goods and services. Since the physical card itself is required to use the card number, it is particularly easy to commit fraud because a fraudulent card can be easily distributed or obtained, while the card number cannot be changed or altered. For example, the fraudulent card may be distributed to someone in the real world who obtains a physical card with the number printed thereon and then uses it. Thus, while the credit card number is unique and difficult to duplicate or change, it is static while the card itself is easily replicated and distributed. Moreover, the credit or debit card number is typically printed or encoded on the card in such a manner so as to be "readable" by someone viewing the card, and the card itself is disposed in a manner such that it is readily accessible. For example, the card may be disposed in a purse, wallet, or pocket. Thus, while the credit or debit card number may be unique, it is also readily accessible and the card itself is easily replicated by someone viewing it. More recently, in lieu of printed numbers, biometric devices have been employed which are authenticated to confirm the identity of the individual operating the device.
