Customizing Lightroom into a photo organizer and a way to process images has become a cornerstone of its success. I use a bunch of institutional workflows, but it's easier to set up new workflows in the newer version than with previous versions. Photoshop is a long-running hit. It had a good run with the early adopters, but it seems the user base has become broader. For all its problems, the app is still worth a try. First, let's talk about adding parallel processing to the 5-series Lightrooms. We know that Lightroom can use all the processing power it can get when you're shooting in RAW. In Lightroom, you can manually dictate the bit depth and the color settings when you process your files, but the codecs don't have custom settings. Lightroom 5 gives you a choice of how many processors to use, so you can set up a set of custom settings for your images. These processors, called caches, are available immediately after you start up Lightroom, so you always have them available. Sharpening made the round yesterday, with Lightroom 5. I'm happy to get to work on that. It's kind of a high-level thing I have been working on for a long time. It also has some interesting side effects. Most notable is the fact that it has been widened to include any level of sharpness. The outline option, which was only available, say, in Lightroom 4's "Exposure" tab, can now be found anywhere. It doesn't look exactly the same, however. I haven't quite figured out how to recreate the appearance of older outlines.

The tools palette is also where you choose a tool preset, such as a Gradient tool, Rotate tool, or Move tool. The only downside of the Photoshop Camera is that the app is only available to download for the iPhone for now. I believe that will really change how we use our smartphones in the future. The app is free to download and easy to use. From there you can edit your photos and apply effects that will really put your creativity to the test. Enjoy this free tool and hit us up with any feedback in the comments below. You will not regret it. In fact, our Mac is our main computer. I'm using it for almost everything.
